Statement of Significance

Last updated on - June 25, 1998

Individual place statement of significance:

The Keilor Hotel is of State historical and archaeological significance as a rare and relatively intact mid-nineteenth century public house which served the early traffic to the Mt. Alexander goldfields. It is also of significance for its association with the pioneering families of the district, the Dodds and Goudies. It is also of architectural significance as a rare early bluestone hotel which, although modified, demonstrates the type of coaching inn design common in the mid nineteenth century.

Precinct statement of significance:

Of State significance as an important remnant streetscape relating to the goldfields era village of Keilor, and with several substantial and intact buildings from the Gold Rush period including the Keilor Hotel, Court House and Police Station.

Physical Description 1

A verandahed bluestone hotel originally with hipped roof bays projecting at each end almost to the property line and a straight profile, timber-framed verandah between. The main entrance was diagonally across the corner at the western end, while windows were 12 paned sashes having single blocks of bluestone as lintels. Originally having walls of bare coursed bluestone, parts have been subsequently rendered, although internal walls and fireplaces have recently been stripped back to the stone. The details of the facade have been altered, such as verandah posts and windows. Other more recent additions have been made to the building, including a c.1920s wing that was remodelled in a 'heritage' style in the 1980s. A stable block nearby appears to have been incorporated into other extensions.
